Captain Marvel: Why Brie Larson's Carol Danvers is a Marvel

game-changer Captain America and co were left in a tricky position at the end of Avengers: Infinity War, but help may be at hand with the arrival of Captain Marvel. The first trailer for Brie Larson's Marvel movie has premiered ahead of its 2019 release. Marvel Studios Chief Kevin Feige has described Carol Danvers as "the most powerful character" so far in the Marvel Cinematic Universe. So it seems there's finally someone set to go toe-to-toe with villain Thanos. The trailer sees Brie meeting Samuel L. Jackson as Nick Fury after a period of time spent away from planet earth, power up as Captain Marvel and punch a smiling old lady in the face (who is almost certainly an alien in disguise - we hope). The film is set in the nineties - in case the extras in retro clothes, a Blockbuster video store and pagers didn't give that away. 'I didn't know that female superheroes even existed' The movie is the first Marvel film to have a female star as its lead in a decade of building its Marvel Cinematic Universe. The closest we've come before now is when Evangeline Lilly's character The Wasp appeared in the title of Ant Man sequel, Ant Man and The Wasp. That means a lot to viewers like Aida Latifi, who's 18, lives in Iran and started watching Sam Raimi's Spider-Man movies after school when she was younger. "Before I saw the Avengers I didn't even know that female superheroes even existed," she tells Newsbeat. "It didn't even cross my mind. As weird as it might be, seeing Black Widow just boosted my confidence as a child." And she says this is why Captain Marvel's arrival has special meaning for people like her. "Captain Marvel's arrival in the MCU is very important, especially for children in countries like mine," she adds. "It shows them that they can be as strong as the boys and deserve equal rights." Who is Captain Marvel? Captain Marvel is the hero that Samuel L. Jackson, as Shield boss Nick Fury, called for help at the end of Avengers: Infinity War. She's super strong, can fly, survive in space and project energy (among other things) making Carol Danvers to The Avengers what Superman is to Justice League: the big hitter. "She's more powerful than, possibly, all The Avengers combined," says Claire Lim, a huge comic book fan and a presenter for BBC's The Social. "It's important they're actually putting a female front and centre as a superhero powerful enough to beat this threat." A new start for the MCU as we know it. On a more practical level, the introduction of Brie Larson as a potential new leader of the Avengers solves problems thrown up by the end of contractual agreements with the franchise's biggest names. Chris Hemsworth, Chris Evans, Scarlett Johansson, Robert Downey Jr and more of the main cast members are not contracted to appear in movies beyond the fourth Avengers movie, the Infinity War sequel. "Marvel have played it so well over the past ten years, I think people are ready for different heroes," says Claire, who's excited by the casting of Lashana Lynch as fighter pilot Maria Rambeau, mother of another female Avenger. "I'd like to see Monica Rambeau, it would be great to see Photon," she says. "It would be good to get odd characters like that who people don't really know about." BBC

Downton Abbey movie set like a school reunion - Julian Fellowes Shooting the movie version of TV drama Downton Abbey feels like the "reunion" of a very "happy" school, the show's creator Julian Fellowes has said. The writer was back with the cast last week at Highclere Castle, Berkshire, to start filming the big screen revival. He said seeing the reassembled cast in their costumes was a "surreal moment". He said he wasn't "daunted" by trying to translate the success to a feature film, adding: "I hope we've done well and the people will enjoy it." But Lord Fellowes said he wasn't making any assumptions about the potentially tricky transition from the small to the big screen. "In life you can't let yourself be daunted by the fact that it doesn't work out for some people," he told BBC News. "You just have to keep charging on and have a go and do your best... I don't think one should expect everything to be a triumph. "I've done my best, I know the cast are doing their best and I think it will be fun. But I won't count any chickens, thank you, until it is out, until we know how it is doing." Lord Fellowes is no stranger to Hollywood success, however, having won the Oscar for best original screenplay for Gosford Park in 2002. Going from television to film does present different challenges, he said. "[In a series] we usually give the big stories to maybe three characters a week... By the end of the series everyone would have big stories and it would all be plaited together. "In a film you can't do that. Every character you include you must have their own story. The viewer can judge whether or not I have been successful, I wouldn't make any claims. "I had to make sure every story of every character was completed within the movie. That did take a certain amount of jiggery-pokery, but I am pleased with where we came to and very pleased with the reassembled cast. "I was at Highclere [where the TV series was shot] on Friday and there was something almost surreal seeing them back in their costumes. "It was a very happy time for us all. It was a big hit all over the world. It was a very nice cast and I think they made a lot of good friends among them so there was something of a reunion like the first day back at school... a very happy school." Details of the film's plot are being kept tightly under wraps, and Lord Fellowes said he never answers questions about the storyline. Nostalgic fans will have to wait until next year for the Downton Abbey movie to be released. The TV series ran from 2010 to 2015, winning 15 Emmys and three Golden Globes, with the finale watched by almost 11 million people in the UK on Christmas Day 2015. BBC
